FICTION: IMMIGRATION

Kind of Kin

by Rilla Askew (Ecco)

Bob's old truck running and head on the road.

House is not a sympathetic character, because she's been given no attractive except perhaps nice hair. She is an ideofazed by pragmatism, and a narcissist. Comes to a head under the reluctant ship of Oren. It is he who Sweet turns to dance, he who organizes the visiting the jail. Circumstances uncover a pre-unknown strength.

W's novel delivers the unexpected. It ments both funny and sublime, but it truly a parody. It is also not a screed. Moorehouse seems flat, all of the eters are drawn in the kind of broad es intended to move the story for-ugh the author is clearly more sympa-to one side of the debate, she makes her s using tangible impacts on real families. ately the novel calls for conscience, rship and courage, characteristics that missing from more than just the immi-on reform debate.

le questions left for the reader to pon-re, just how broad a net does one cast identify kin and, once that question is vered, aren't kin generally in things her?
